

The whole scandal at the News of the World about phone hacking has made me think a lot about truth, and our commitment to the truth.

One of the News of the World journalists was interviewed about phone hacking and he was utterly unrepentant. His line was that the role of a journalist was to tell the truth and what better way to get at the truth about what people were doing in secret than to hack their phones?

Another journalist who was interviewed about the subject also insisted his interest was in the truth, but later on in the interview gave a rather more accurate description of tabloid journalism: it's all about gossip. But notoriously gossip isn't really about getting your facts right. It's about telling a good story and entertaining the people who are listening or reading.

Even if gossip is true, it often shows no charity towards the people being talked about. We say, "Truth hurts", which contrasts oddly with the kind of truth Jesus talked about, "The truth will set you free." (John 8:32). The truth of the Gospel is a truth wedded to love. Even if we think we're committed to truth, we will do the truth no service if we speak the truth, but without love.

Of course, the events of the past weeks and months strongly suggest that journalistic commitment to truth is rather patchy at best. If messages were deleted from Milly Dowler's phone, those actions destroyed evidence, led the police away from the truth about the case, and all in the name of a big story.

Again, if it's true that large numbers of emails have been deleted to avoid the police ever finding out who was responsible for these actions, then it looks like the journalists at the News of the World had only a pretended interest in truth. They wanted stories to entertain their readers, which had to be true enough not to land them in the libel courts, but when they themselves became the story, the focus of interest, instead of telling the truth it seems they've tried to obscure it.

This article is not intended as an attack on the News of the World. Hopefully, in their case, justice will be done and those who are guilty will be punished. This kind of patchy, halfhearted interest in truth spreads far beyond the News of the World, and far beyond journalism. If we're honest with ourselves, we very often have just that same kind of pretended interest in the truth.

We avoid the truth, especially about ourselves, because we're aware that our own lives are shabby in parts, wouldn't stand up to close scrutiny. Perhaps for many people, the adolescent thought, "If people really knew what I was like, they wouldn't like me," never goes away.

That thought forgets that the deepest truth about us is that God created us, in His own image no less, that God loved us into existence. We have no doubt, all of us, done foolish and even sometimes shameful things, and we should be ashamed of them. But God in His love forgives us, transforms us, so that even our sins, once forgiven, become evidence of the love of God in our lives.

There are of course situations where we should tell the truth about what people do in private. When those with power misuse it and harm others, when public figures try to hide the things they have done which bear on their public office, journalists do us a great service in bringing these things to light.

But whenever we tell the truth, about others, even about ourselves, we must speak that truth in love, aware that every person we speak about deserves respect and has a dignity, that even people who have made the worst kinds of mistakes are loved by God, and ought to be loved by us.
