

FOR the past few months, Fr. Leon has laboriously composed a 'Back Page' for the newsletter each week, describing the new translation of the Mass. Exactly when this will come into use we don't know, but it will probably be some time in the course of the coming year. Till, it is good to be prepared for it when it does come. Now Fr. Leon has completed that task, and we are reverting to the familiar pattern, with one of the Friars writing a comment each week, so you get constant change and variety.

When you come to think of it, it is very appropriate for this to happen at the first Sunday of Advent. Advent is a new beginning. And naturally that makes you think of the future. We are making a fresh start, perhaps taking a new direction, or at least renewing our old aims. So we are thinking about the present and the future, where we are and where we are going to.

But in today's readings, Isaiah and Jesus seem to have very different views of the future. Isaiah gives a visionary picture of the days when the Temple of the Lord will be the centre of life for all nations, when God's law will be followed by everyone and there will be universal justice and peace. In contrast, Jesus dwells more on judgement. The day 'when the Son of Man comes' will be a day that separates the good from the bad. 'One is taken and the other left.' Until then both the date of the judgement and its results are hidden from us, and life continues in all its ordinariness and ambiguity. 'As in Isaiah's day.' Watchfulness, like that of a householder waiting to catch the burglar. This is what we need.

And this is what St Paul says too. We should be awake now, like people waiting for the dawn. If our expectation is for the light, then we should live as people of the light. We should leave aside the deeds of darkness and live as in the light. Isaiah is describing the final goal, the future, when God's purposes are fulfilled. He uses the image of the Temple because that was what he was familiar with. In contrast, Jesus and Paul are speaking of our expectations, of how we live as people whose vision is upheld by hope and trust in the Son of Man.
